Medical Marijuana Unlikely Swine Flu Cure

Swine Flu Cases Up 52%

The spread of swine flu is now outpacing CDC projections for Northern California, but semi-legitimate doctors from the region have found a cure: medical marijuana.

Andrew Wollengard was the first swine flu victim to seek a medical cannabis prescription. "It was self-diagnosed," Wollengard admits. "I had been trying to get a club card for a while, so I went to a doctor who writes weed prescriptions and told him I had swine flu. It worked."

Wollengard then told all his friends, many of whom immediately came down with the illness and sought similar treatment.

The trend is puzzling health professionals across the country. "Normally we caution against smoking while suffering from illnesses that affect the respiratory system," says Lara Willamette, who advises Governor Schwarzenegger on health policy. "But it actually seems to be working. Almost as soon as patients receive their medical cannabis cards, their symptoms vanish. It's quite uncanny."

In anticipation of an outbreak on the Stanford campus, Vaden Health Center will be opening a dispensary where afflicted students can purchase various medicinal cannabis products: tea, edibles, and plain old weed. Students have reportedly already begun camping out along Campus Drive.

"I just want to be prepared for anything," says Liz Buckwalter '11. "When it comes to swine flu, you really can't be too cautious."

Native Americans Lose Reservation: Wait 15 Minutes For Seat

For hundreds of years, Native Americans have dealt with countless instances of racial discrimination. Natives were forced to leave their homes behind, ousted by an insensitive and intolerant government.

America claims to have learned from its past mistakes. Indeed, reparations have been paid, casinos opened, and drug laws "enforced," but even as we right past wrongs, we still have not learned from our mistakes.

Just last week, a group of whites successfully claimed a Native American reservation as their own.

Last Tuesday, Frank Ironcloud decided to go out to dinner with his family.

"We wanted to go to a nice Italian restaurant, so I decided it would be a good idea to call the restaurant and make sure we'd have a spot. When we got there, I found out my reservation had been taken," said Ironcloud.

Lucie Ferro explained what happened next: "I didn't know what to say. Just five minutes earlier a group came in and acted like they had reservations. Ironcloud definitely sounds like an Indian name, but we aren't allowed to use racial profiling here, so I couldn't do anything. Then, when the real Ironcloud came in, it was too late. There weren't any reservations left."

Another sad tale in restaurant management and mistreatment of Native Americans.

Sex in Steam Tunnels: "Too Hot and Steamy"

UNDISCLOSED LOCATION- Two freshmen were spotted emerging sweaty and red-faced from Stanford's famed network of steam tunnels late Monday evening after a period of underground sexual debauchery. They did not exit the steam tunnels with the usual contented swagger of a copulating couple; rather, they seemed highly disturbed and uncomfortable.

"Cosmo and Elle always advertised sex to me as something that is best when hot and steamy," said the female, whose name will remain anonymous, "so I told Kyle that we should do it in the hottest and steamiest place that I had heard of on campus."

"Big mistake," commented the male, "I should never have followed her advice. It was just too hot and steamy in there, I couldn't even concentrate."

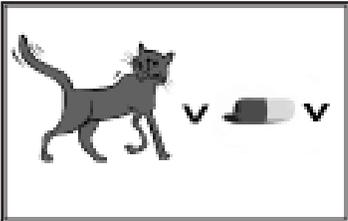

"It was terrible," she said, "and the hotness and steaminess made it even more uncomfortable. If good sex is supposed to be hot and steamy like that, then I never want to have sex again." Originally arriving at Stanford with plans to be a communications major, she now wants to switch to Religious Studies and join a convent. Kyle, who had planned to be a biomedical engineer, now plans to be a feminist studies major.

The number of cases of diagnosed and undiagnosed swine flu at Stanford. This means that you probably have the swine and you didn't even know it. What about that 0.4 you ask? Well, it's mostly technical jargon but that 0.4 case is the guy on your IM team who is just about to get it because of you.
