RICH MAN, HOT YOUNG WOMAN OVERCOME OBSTACLES TO FIND TRUE LOVE

It's a story truly worthy of attention on this Valentine's Day February 14th, and it can teach us just a little bit about the power of love.

Christopher Duke and Amy Morgan are not your typical married couple. He's the 70-year-old owner of multibillion dollar steel conglomerate Alcoa, and she was a busty blonde personal trainer at the gym where he rode the stationary bike twice a week. Yet one day she worked up the courage to seduce him after his workout, and now they are happily in love.

"It's pretty amazing," said a family friend who wished to remain anonymous. "Not only did they have to work through a 47-year age difference, but on top of that a massive income disparity as well. The fact that they were able to do both really speaks volumes about what the human heart is capable of."

The loving pair does everything together: from buying Amy a new pink convertible with vanity plate, to making sure Christopher remembers to take his prostate medication. Even Duke's own teenage grandsons have expressed awe at the deep and passionate tenderness between the two, saying of their new grandmother, "Hot damn."

Duke's lawyer was also quick to note the duo's palpable chemistry. "I really saw the sparkle in her eye when he was signing the will that would leave her half of his immense fortune. It just shows that even in kind of a morbid situation like that, she was just incredibly loving and excited to be with him."

So let them be a lesson for the naysayers who claim that true love is only for birds of a feather. After all, Christopher and his old wife were both old and unattractive, and now they're divorced. (Driscoll)

Stanford Students Found Revolutionary Startup That Does Nothing

SOTO--Two budding computer science majors from Soto released their latest project to the world yesterday, and tech pundits around the globe are going wild.

The site, called Jitterbunk, is a revolutionary startup that hopes to combine social media to advance the global economy and change the way we go about our daily lives. The founders are one white guy and one Asian guy, and they both seem to know a lot about computers.

Students have gone wild so far about the site. "It's great how I can just jitterbunk my friends whenever I want. It's amazing what these kids have been able to do in such a short period of time."

There has already been speculation about an IPO in the near future for Jitterbunk, and Techcruch has valued the company at near 2 million dollars.

"We are looking to expand our user base," said the founder. "We started small, but we have big goals now." (Keeshin)

Opinion: Selling Chocolate Vaginas is Wrong—It Objectifies Chocolate

This week, I received several e-mails promoting "V-Week" events—film screenings, panel discussions, Oprah praising sessions, etc. But while vaginas are certainly to be celebrated (believe me—I love vaginas just as much as the next guy), I take issue with the V-Week Chocolate Vagina sale. In their rush to promote their vaginas, Stanford women have forgotten that chocolates are not just random collections of sugar, melted together for our idle amusement, consumed only to satisfy our human desires. No—chocolates are special. Each one has a unique taste, a special quality that should be appreciated and respected.

By selling their chocolate vaginas, V-Week proponents are saying that chocolates are just objects to be sold, commodities to place on the market, to use only for profit and personal gain. Even worse, the V-Week women fail to recognize chocolate diversity. Gone are the distinctions between white and black, sweet and semi-sweet, dark and light. Gone are the caramel chocolates and the hot chocolates, the Belgian chocolates and the Swiss chocolates, the whipped chocolates and the mint chocolates. By selling their uniform vaginas, the women of Stanford deny the diversity and specialness of chocolates everywhere.

As a chocolate advocate, I can't sit idly by, chewing on vaginas and watching as the chocolates I love so much suffer at the hands of feminists. No! I must take a stand! I must make a statement so that this objectification can never happen again! To all chocolate lovers—join me in boycotting chocolate vaginas. Help me send a message that will not soon be forgotten: Chocolates deserve our respect and admiration. They are not objects to be used to fulfill human urges, but are instead sensitive and delicate bundles of joy that we should strive to protect from fat kids, nutritionists, and heat sources. (Adler)
