Four Loko Use Falls, Charlie Sheen Use Skyrockets

It's only been months since Four Loko has been off shelves, and college students have already found a much more dangerous replacement. The popular drink, which combined caffeine and alcohol, was banned by the FDA late last year due to a series of reports that it posed serious risks to young people, including increased heart rate, excessive fun and the desire to never drink another Four Loko.

Recently, however, deans of colleges across the country have reported a serious and unintended consequence of that ban. In place of Four Loko, a new drug called Charlie Sheen has cropped up on college campuses and the results have proven dire. While the dangerous effects of Four Loko were proven unequivocally during a Today Show special, the exact effects of Charlie Sheen, however, are not yet entirely understood by scientists.

Early reports, however, don't look good.

According to campus police at Winchester College in Maine, the faces of 15 students melted off completely after having taken just one hit of Charlie Sheen at a fraternity party. On the other side of the country at Dusquene College in Nevada, 10 students are reported to have ingested Charlie Sheen right before their bodies exploded in a violent burst. We caught up with one student who reported having tried the drug, and he says that he would be in support of a ban. "Charlie Sheen was too much for my human brain to handle. I just didn't have the constitution for it." His funeral will be held next Monday. Although there are no current plans to ban Charlie Sheen, an FDA announcement is scheduled for late next week. (Reid)

"Charlie Sheen was too much for my human brain to handle."

Vicious TriDelt Pillow Fight Leaves 7 Dead, 16 Wounded

Stanford students were shocked by a recent case of lighthearted playing gone horribly wrong. What started out as an impromptu pillow fight quickly devolved into a bloodbath.

"Me and Laura were baking pancakes in the kitchen when we heard noises in the activity room," said Heather Croft, survivor of the TriDelt Pillow Massacre. "Right when we opened the door we were ambushed by Aubrey and Sara, so we picked up some couch pillows and retaliated. It was crazy."

"It was all going well until a couple of people started accusing Jessica of hiding rolls of quarters in her pillowcase"

Dozens of other TriDelts quickly joined the pillow fight, which many thought would be just a fun safe study-time distraction.

"It was all going well until a couple of people started accusing Jessica of hiding rolls of quarters in her pillowcase," said Ashley Neunzert, another survivor. "A bunch of girls then snuck out and came back with their pillowcases significantly lumpier. And then Britney really started to rage rage rage—but, like, not in the good way."

Investigators found several pillowcases filled with rocks, beer bottles, and even knives. In one particularly noteworthy case, there was a pillow case which contained multiple sawed-off shotguns. None of the pillowcases contained feathers or any other conventional pillow fillings.

"This is still not the worst thing to happen in the TriDelt activity room," said Megan Trombley. "I still shudder when I think of that Twister game we played last year...so many broken bones."

In response to the pillow massacre, the University has issued a temporary ban on all pillows, snuggies, and other soft items. Sources close to President Hennessy indicate the ban will be lifted "as soon as those girls learn to behave themselves." (Evans)

GM Successfully Petitions Way Onto Special Fees Ballot

In wake of the recent economic downturn, GM has been put on the ballot for Special Fees at Stanford University because they heard how they could receive lucrative budgets with little scrutiny.

Some Stanford students have questioned the budget request, but most people figure it's probably reasonable, and that the company really needs what they ask for. Students even overlooked the three million dollars budgeted for executive salaries and food for meetings.

"It's a really great opportunity for us," said GM CEO Dan Akerson. "These students are willing to throw money at just about everything, and all we needed was 1000 signatures."

President Obama was relieved to hear that he would no longer need to provide money to the failing company. If only America could also rely on Special Fees to fix all needs and reduce our national debt.... (Galant)

The percentage of women who are not in the kitchen at any given time. Fortunately, the new student organization Stanford Women in the Kitchen (SWIK) has devoted itself to gradually bringing that number down to zero, where it belongs. The ambitious members of SWIK also aspire to double the number of sandwiches made worldwide by 2020.
