Kappa Sigma Loses House, Brothers Adopt Hunter-Gatherer Lifestyle

After losing their housing for the next academic year, members of Kappa Sigma seem to have reverted to a primitive hunter-gatherer lifestyle. Kappa Sigma brothers have been sighted at various locations around campus scavenging for beer and attempting to build rudimentary shelters and squirrel catchers.

Many students worry for the now-nomadic brothers, expressing doubts about whether they will be able to survive in the wild. "I saw this guy digging through a dumpster by Tresidder, and then he turned around, and I realized it was Kappa Sig's social chair, and I was like, that's so sad," said sophomore Kelly Gray. Stanford's branch of Habitat for Humanity has already scheduled a building project to address the issue.

Several lost brothers, who now only have a shopping cart to carry their beer

One brother, who asked that his name be withheld, felt that his three years of Stanford education were turning out to be of no practical use to him. "Bro, I'm just living hand to mouth right now. None of the Economics or IHUM classes I took prepared me at all for this—even Sleep and Dreams was useless," he said glumly. "I don't even know which plants are okay to eat and which are good to smoke."

Some brothers remain defiant and hopeful even in the face of such strife. Over the last week, "Jake" and "Steven" have been amassing a pile of rocks at their temporary base, an oak tree in the wilderness beyond FroSoCo. Jake is not fazed by his homeless condition. "We're going to take the house back any day now, as soon as we figure out how to sharpen these stones and start fires. We might lose some brothers along the way, but it's a sacrifice we'll have to make." Steven grunted in agreement. (Kofman)

MUAMMAR GADDAFI DECLARES CANDIDACY FOR ASSU SENATE

68-year-old Libyan dictator Muammar Gaddafi formally renounced his position as supreme leader of Libya in order to pursue, in his own words, "a much more meaningful elected office." He has said that his zest for the ASSU Senate will define his candidacy, and that he was willing to "die a martyr" if need be.

Gaddafi's platform is based around ensuring transparency in the funding process, getting more students involved in community activities, and ensuring diversity at the undergraduate and graduate levels. He has announced his intent to "clamp down hard" on dissidents that oppose his plans for healthier options at Late Nite and extended Green Library hours. Campaign season has seen the "Mad Dog of the Middle East" coming to tables in Stern Dining Hall with an escort of armed security guards and scantily clad Libyan women to ask students for their input on what they would like to see the ASSU Senate change.

Gaddafi has sought the backing of student groups such as SOCC and GAIA, and attempted to make his campaign posters funny and memorable. The result has been a smattering of endorsements, and the now ubiquitous "Lady Gagaddafi 2014" flyers posted in dorm hallways.

Also declaring their candidacy for one of the 15 ASSU senate seats were Hosni Mubarak, Zine El Abidine Ben Ali, Muammar Khaddafi, Muammar Qaddafi, and "Big Daddy 'Dafi." (Driscoll)

Flipside Implements New Paywall Requiring Readers to Sacrifice Their First Child

In a stunning attempt to save the dying newspaper industry, the Stanford Flipside, Stanford's premier news source, has instituted a paywall policy requiring readers to sacrifice their first born child to access Flipside content online.

Many on the Flipside staff say the paywall has been a year in the works, and fear this is the only way to make up for decreasing advertising revenues.

"It's a high price to pay, but it's worth it for high quality journalism," said 80-year-old and lifetime subscriber Bill Fentam. "Print is dying and you need to cover your ass somehow."

Other Flipside readers think the paywall pricing is a bit steep. "I understand that they have their tiered system, but sacrificing my second child for access to the iPad app and website is too much for me," said reader Jeanette Odgen. "And the trouble is, I really enjoy reading the Flipside."
