North Park Elementary 2nd grader and renowned criminal sketch artist Joey Habman was the hero of last week's Stanford police hunt.

Police contacted the savant artist Habman, who has been drawing since at least kindergarten, to jot down the crucial details of the suspect's profile. The victim of the robbery reportedly told police that the suspect had "two eyes, hair, and a nose, and about ten fingers and two legs."

From this striking detail, Habman was able to beautifully reconstruct a Crayola facial

"Bros for Boobs": Kappa Sigma Brothers to Offer Free Screenings

In an effort to promote their public image and regain their house, the fraternity Kappa Sigma is offering free breast cancer screenings in White Plaza to all females of Stanford.

"We really want to promote breast cancer awareness among the female population at Stanford," said the president of Kappa Sig. "Medical care can be expensive, and our fraternity is thrilled about offering a free manual examination to all women of Stanford. It's the duty of every woman to get screened and the duty of each Kappa Sig male to help that woman."

Kappa Sig members have received extensive training in how to refer women who may have early signs of breast cancer, how to properly disrobe women, and how to differentiate between groping and checking for unusual bumps.

According to members of Kappa Sig, the screenings are also most accurate when the Kappa Sig member has consumed alcoholic beverages that make their response rates more tuned and accurate. They are aiming to offer about 700 hours of free screenings per week in order to reach their community service requirement of 500 hours. "It's a tough job, but somebody has to do it," said Kappa Sig member Ryan Sullivan.

If proven a success, "Bros for Boobs" could be the PR event to help Kappa Sig reinstate their house next year. (Collison, Kwan)

Fate Unites Soulmates During Awkward Fraternity Party Grinding Session

As Allen Henderson ('13) and Monica Stevens ('14) glided across the beer-and-sweat stained dance floor of Sigma Chi last Friday night, little did they know that their course was being carefully guided by destiny.

Fortune seized its chance when Henderson began to muscle his way through the dense crowd to procure another Natural Ice from the makeshift fraternity bar. But Anheuser-Busch brand pale lager wasn't on the menu tonight, as long as fate still had a part to play. While Henderson attempted his exodus from the throbbing mass of humanity, he collided with the dancing form of Monica Stevens and, in that fleeting moment, it was clear that Cupid's arrow had found its mark.

"I could tell from the back of her head that she was the one. The way she undulated to the romantic rhythms of T-Pain and Kanye West was awe-inspiring," explained a lovestruck Henderson. "Plus, she was kinda blocking my way to the bar, so I figured, why not dance with her?"

Stevens was equally enamored with her new dance partner: "I never believed in love at first sight until tonight...although technically I didn't actually see his face until the third song in the playlist...but, you know, he was sober enough to support his own weight, so that was good."

The couple left the party under what was drunkenly-assumed to be a waning crescent moon, and stole off in search of a romantic dining experience at Lagunita Late Nite.

When pressed for details the next morning, neither party had a clear recollection of the meeting. Henderson was last seen pondering a random Facebook friend request from some ugly girl named Monica. (Hoffer)
