STANFORD FLIPSIDE RELEASES FLIPSIDE 2.0

Transparency! Diversity! Entrepreneurship!

STANFORD, CA—The Stanford Flipside, concerned that the current Flipside wasn't working for the student body, announced today the creation of Flipside 2.0. Citing a failure to meet the needs of students, the Flipside has done a complete overhaul of the publication.

"For three years, Flipside readers have been strangled by the lack of innovation going into this publication," said Flipside founder Barney Schmutz, as he took an early issue of the Flipside and threw it in the garbage. "But now things are different. You have a new font style, a slight border around images, and a great new slogan--purely cosmetic changes that are sure to make a real difference on this campus."

"And we're done with the jokes," said layout editor Harrison Sinker. "Those things were for children."

Girlfriend to Start Offering Loyalty Points for Access to Bedroom

STOREY HOUSE, ROW--- Stanford junior and girlfriend Lisa Alberts has started to implement a loyalty points system for her boyfriend Eric Bellman.

Bellman, who has been extremely flakey over the last two and a half months of the relationship, said he has had a hard time keeping up with the loyalty points system.

"First I have to go hang out with her while she does her homework on Tuesday nights to get one point, and then I have to attend her dance show Friday night to get another loyalty point. I need five loyalty points to get in the bedroom... and honestly, these events aren't even related to sex!"

"A few years ago, all I had to do was show up," lamented a visibly frustrated Bellman.

Alberts has said the points system has been extremely effective. "When so many people want access to your bedroom, you just need a way to sort between them."

STANFORD WOMEN WASTE TIME, ENERGY, MONEY

SAN FRANCISCO, CA - Waking up far too early and paying far too much money to run far too long a distance, dozens of Stanford women headed north to San Francisco for the Nike Women's Half-Marathon this past Sunday.

"I feel really validated now that I've run an arbitrary distance in an arbitrary location," said sophomore Jane Davids as she limped back to her car after 2.5 hours of sheer monotony.

"Sure I could have run the same route at a much more convenient time for nothing other than the cost of gas, but then I wouldn't be able to say I completed a real, official half-marathon."

When asked for comment, Nike executive Mitch Baker declined, as he was too busy rolling in money achieved entirely through brand recognition. (Olson)

STANFORD MED SCHOOL: MOTHER'S KISSES CONTAIN HEALING POWER

STANFORD, CA—The worst dreams of Band-Aid® have finally come true.

At the culmination of a 4-year study, a group of Stanford Medical students have confirmed that a mother's kiss will indeed heal her son's boo-boos. The announcement came through the head of the Stanford Medical School, Ph.D and M.D. Dr. David Thomas.

"This study will change the world of medicine forever." Thomas proudly smiled and continued, "A certain chemical reaction occurs with the lips of a mother and a child's bumps, bruises, scratches, cuts, and owwies. Consequently, the wounds heal almost twice as fast as those not touched by maternal lips."

These findings have shaken the economy to say the least. Sales of band-aids and first aid supplies have dropped astronomically, while moms across the world are offering kisses for money on the black market.

Stay-at-home dad Mark Winter explained the predicament, "When my wife is out I'm the one watching the kids at home. If my son trips and scrapes his knee I can't wait all day for her to get home from work to kiss him, so I'll drive my son to the corner of 12th and 42nd where there are plenty of moms willing to kiss his knee for money."

Today, Congress debates the legality of this newly improvised system sweeping the country and Stanford begins a study to test if a child's performance improves when his uptight father yells critical encouragement during a little league sporting event. (Abrams)

The number of times the Iraq War has ended. First, Bush declared victory after 2 months. Then, Obama ended it when he first became President. Now, out of the blue, he's ending it again. The American public is just hoping that we can end the war a few more times before the end of the Obama presidency because it's always such good news when we announce it.
